Rebecca Terrell

A contributor to The New American magazine since 2009 and now senior editor, Rebecca Terrell has been a member of The John Birch Society since 1983 and later worked for U.S. Congressman Ron Paul, for whom she authored the 1997 American Sovereignty Restoration Act to end U.S. membership in the United Nations. Variations of the same bill were introduced in every Congress for the next 25 years. In 2023, under the pseudonym of "Dr. Susie," she wrote and illustrated the top-rated And to Think that I Saw It on K Street NW, a satirical, Dr. Seuss-spoof, exposing the stranglehold exerted on Washington DC by powerful lobbyists and mainstream media. The daughter of a farmer, Rebecca grew up in a Birch household and attended summer Birch camps during her teen and young adult years. She now lives in Memphis, Tennessee, where she is a church organist.

STOPPING THE WAR ON FARMERS

Globalists are waging a war on farmers and ranchers around the world. These international elites seek total control of the food supply — and humanity with it.

The global war on farmers goes back to the United Nations' Agenda 21 (now Agenda 2030). Additionally, the World Economic Forum is one of the main organizations pushing for Agenda 2030 and the war on farmers.

"Fertilizer shortages are real now. As a result, we're working with countries to think about natural solutions like manure and compost, and this may hasten transitions.... Never let a crisis go to waste."

— USAID Administrator Samantha Power

CO₂ PIPELINES

Trampling on Property Rights & Local Control

Farmers across the Midwest are having their property rights threatened by big CO₂ pipeline companies. Here we look at ways people can fight back.

by Steve Kenkel

Warning: Local elected officials and landowners, your ability to protect the public and preserve private-property rights is under siege! If you choose to sit tight, watch from afar, and hope someone else will fight carbon-capture pipelines, you may wake up one day and find that the tools officials presently have in their toolbox to protect county home rule and enact local zoning ordinances will be things of the past. For ordinary landowners, the freedoms and rights you take for granted will also be in jeopardy.

I know because I've been fighting this battle for nearly two years. I have been surprised and disappointed that so many county supervisors throw up their hands and say, "There's not much we can do. This is a federal pipeline; it's just going to happen." But county supervisors are empowered to protect and preserve the rights, privileges, and property of the county and its residents, and to preserve and improve the peace, safety, health, welfare, comfort, and conveniences of its residents. They just need to try!

The general public and local landowners often wrongly believe that county supervisors can prevent carbon-capture corporations from being granted eminent domain over the land of others. However, in Iowa, counties have no authority to grant or deny eminent domain for CO₂ and other hazardous pipelines. That authority rests solely with the Iowa Utilities Board (IUB). Iowa law instead empowers supervisors with the local tools of county home rule and zoning power to protect their citizens. High-pressure, hazardous CO₂ pipelines and sequestration projects are lining up around our nation to trample on our constitutionally protected property rights and the local tools we have long used to protect them. Greed and a sense of entitlement by wealthy and politically influential investors seeking to capitalize on billions in federal tax credits are causing a stampede of CO₂ pipelines racing toward the finish line in the Midwest.

The federal Inflation Reduction Act, passed in August 2022, increased those tax credits from $50 to $85 per ton for carbon permanently stored underground, further exacerbating the mad dash to build private pipelines for corporate profit at public expense. This almost literally amounts to throwing money down a hole, and one day we will recognize it as an epic boondoggle.

We have one shot to stop this corporate cronyism and theft of our private property. Putting CO₂ in a pipeline and transporting it thousands of miles across other people's land only to bury it makes no sense and serves no public purpose. However, if they are successful, it will set a bad precedent and open a floodgate that could forever change property rights in our nation.

I am completing my 11th year as a su-
